Las Mariposas: The Mirabal Sisters
Las Mariposas: Sisters who Toppled a Dictatorship

Rafael Trujillo is infamous for being one of the cruelest dictators in the history of Latin America. He “won” the presidency of the Dominican Republic (DR) in 1930 through political maneuvering and torture, and his band of secret police kept the Dominican people in a state of submission for over thirty years. Those who opposed Trujillo would often be imprisoned, tortured and then disappear, presumably murdered. The end of Trujillo’s reign is primarily credited to the Mirabal sisters, popularly called Las Mariposas, which translates to “The Butterflies” in Spanish.

The sisters, Minerva, Patria, Maria Teresa, and Dede Mirabal—or Las Mariposas—were born into a small farming community. All of the sisters except Dede attended a university, and their education enabled them to envision their country free of Trujillo’s reign. The three sisters who attended a university married men they met at their school. Ultimately, these three sisters and their respective husbands became activists against Trujillo. This culminated in Las Mariposas creating a group called the Movement on the Fourteenth of June to oppose Trujillo, which was named to commemorate the people Patria saw massacred by Trujillo’s secret police on June 14th, 1959.

The Mirabals’ rise against Trujillo escalated at a party that the Mirabal family was invited to attend by Trujillo himself. The dictator was known for his seduction, abduction, and rape of beautiful young women, and Minerva was particularly beautiful. Trujillo approached her with clear sexual advances, but Minerva rejected him, slapping him in the face. The family fled from the party, but Trujillo’s anger followed them for decades.
Las Mariposas: Sisters who Toppled a Dictatorship

The Mirabal sisters and their husbands began working hard to topple Trujillo. They wrote and distributed pamphlets describing the people who had been killed by Trujillo, encouraging complacent Dominican citizens to rise up against their dictator. They gathered materials for weapons, and they made bombs out of firecrackers to use to assassinate Trujillo at a cattle fair in 1960. Their assassination attempt was exposed and the entirety of their activist group, the Movement of the Fourteenth of June, was imprisoned. Trujillo chose to release the women due to rising international pressure from the United Nations to appear ethical as a leader, but this assassination attempt made him decide that it was time to end Las Mariposas.

Las Mariposas: Patria, Minerva, & Maria Teresa Mirabal

The execution of the Mirabal sisters was a clumsy, brutal affair. Trujillo ordered their husbands to be transferred to a remote prison which required travel across the mountains. The sisters knew this was a trap, but decided to visit their husbands anyway. The sisters and their driver, Rufina de la Cruz, were stopped halfway through their journey and were subsequently beat and strangled to death and were put back in their vehicle, which was thrown off the side of the mountain. The obvious trauma on the bodies proved that this was not an accident, as Trujillo intended everyone to believe.
Las Mariposas: Sisters who Toppled a Dictatorship

Trujillo’s cowardly assassination of three beautiful, beloved women had a greater effect on the Dominican population than any of Trujillo’s prior crimes. Six months after the Mirabals’ death, Trujillo was assassinated by a small group of Dominican men, a few of whom were members of the military. The DR was thrown into civil war and became a democratic nation in the late 1960s. The Mirabal sisters’ martyrdom was the catalyst to this assassination—the women were commemorated in nearly every town in the DR, and a mural of their images was painted on the giant obelisk Trujillo built to symbolize his dominance in the DR in previous years.

Additionally, the United Nations created the International Day for the Elimination of Violence Against Women on November 25th in memory of the Mirabal sisters. This day has been used to create international awareness of violence against women and young girls, which is considered “the most widespread, persistent, and devastating human rights violations in our world today” (The United Nations, n.d.). In 2009, November 25th became Orange Day, which aims to mobilize “civil society, activists, governments, and the United Nations (UN) system to amplify the impact of the UN general secretary’s campaign, UNiTE to end Violence Against Women” (The United Nations, n.d.). The legacy of the Mirabal sisters has spread far beyond the DR and has subsequently led to the pursuit of the freedom of every woman and girl who experiences violence.

Niillas Holmberg: A Saami Poet for Peace

Born in Utsoji, Saamiland, musician and poet Niillas Holmberg grew up in the Saami indigenous tradition with his family. Saamiland is a region of northern Scandinavia that is inhabited by the Saami people of Arctic Europe. Most Saami people do not associate with the identity of their constructed region, which is currently within the geopolitical boundaries of Finland, Norway, and Sweden.

There are currently around 80,000 Saami people living in the Saapmi region (Northern Norway). About 20,000 of this population speak Northern Saami, which is considered a European minority language. Historically, there has been a great deal of forced cultural adaptation on the Saami people by the governments of Sweden, Norway, and Finland. However, the Saami have been granted more rights by their respective countries’ governments over time.

Holmberg grew up knowing that his Saami identity was important, but he began to feel distant from his cultural heritage after living in the city of Tampere, Finland during his teenage years. It was during this time Holmberg realized the numerous ways in which the Saami community and environment was being harmed—culminating in his desire to become an activist. Therefore, Holmberg moved back to the Saami region of Finland in order to stay connected to his roots, and to pursue his passion for environmental and cultural preservation in his work.
Niillas Holmberg: A Saami Poet for Peace

Holmberg developed an interest in music and poetry following his activism, as he believed it was a productive way to get his messages to reach a wider audience. His first poetry book, Dego Livcen Oaidnan Iezan (2009), was published by the time he was nineteen. To date, he has published five poetry books in ten different languages and is a member of four bands. Over the years, his works have become increasingly political in order to make an impact on the future of indigenous people and land.

It comes as no surprise that Holmberg’s poetry is written in Northern Saami and is primarily focused on politics which involve the Saami people and other indigenous groups in Norway, Sweden, and Finland. Holmberg is constantly inspired by the nature and peace of Saamiland, citing it as the main source of his creativity. Although living in his rural hometown is not conducive to a life of traveling, Holmberg desires to stay immersed in the culture.

Niillas Holmberg considers himself to be a spokesman for Saami and indigenous pride and culture. In his poem titled, “Indigenous Manifesto,” that speaks to the problem of indigenous lands being abused, he writes: “stop throwing stones / for the water is me / when there is stillness I will show you / the flowers you have planted”.

Holmberg’s main activism revolves around the exploitation of nature, mining and fisheries, particularly in Saami areas. He hopes that his art will motivate younger generations and politicians alike to take action on frequently ignored Saami issues. Some of Holmberg’s most outwardly political messages include his song of protest, “Gallok,” against mining in Gallok, Sweden, and his continual activism against the Deatnu River Fishery agreements – both situations infringe on the fishing and land rights of the Saami people.

In addition to writing songs of protest, Holmberg utilizes his live performances to showcase and discuss current environmental and political issues that the Saami are facing. He also has been known to take part in public demonstrations, such as protesting the construction of a windmill park on Saami lands. In 2017, Holmberg started the Long Live Deatnu movement against the aforementioned Deatnu River Fishery and declared all fishing must stop in the Cearretsuolu region of Saami to protect native lands and tradition. His song “Ellos Deatnu” is about this movement.

Ultimately, Holmberg believes a focus on traditional values towards the earth is the best way to save the future of the planet and hopes to strengthen the connection between humans and nature. He uses his poetry as a form of non-violent protest for issues that often go unseen by the rest of the world. Holmberg hopes to strengthen and empower the force of the next generation to bring peace to the earth and Saami people alike—the fight for indigenous freedoms is never ending.
