Spotlight: Interview with John Peterson, M.D. Physician, Musician, and Peace Activist

ME: How did you get started as a board member for the Peace Center?

DR. PETERSON: Let's see, I got an email from Larry Gerstein. Gerry Waite was also one of the members organizing it. I think they wanted to expand it to more community, and not just university people. I knew both of them pretty well.

ME: Can you tell me a little bit about your background and how you have been involved with peace-related activities?

DR. PETERSON: I was a musician and was always asked to play for anti-Vietnam war rallies. I was organizer of anti-war movement activities, especially after Kent State in 1970. I'm probably on J. Edgar Hoover's files because of my activities back then. I was playing in a black, rhythm and blues band in Alabama in 1970 before I started medical school, and at that point in Alabama that kind of thing was just outrageous. So this beady-eyed guy with a camera kept taking shots of me, hair down to my waist, making funny faces.

I continued to get involved with those issues and by the late 70s and 80s got involved with meditation programs. One of which, was an advanced technique that was shown in research studies to actually have an effect on the whole population, when practiced in a group. These ancient Vedic techniques were from this ancient tradition of the Himalayas in India. My wife became a teacher of Transcendental Meditation and we both had the opportunity to study with Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, one of the great teachers of that tradition. He started bringing out these world peace techniques where there are certain meditation practices and then something called Yogic flying, that are practiced as a group. They would have this effect on coherent brain-wave activity and that effect then would spread throughout the population. They actually did studies on it.

ME: Is this still being used today?

DR. PETERSON: Yea, in fact it's being used all the time. There's now an attempt to get square root of 1% of the world's population to be doing this, and that will affect the whole world's population. There are groups in India, a university in Iowa, and most recently in December, a group of indigenous Indians, Mexican Indians, who were practicing this technique in the Mayan temples. There's a lot of really interesting techniques and research going on. Vicki and I are planning to present that at this conference coming up (Cohen Peace Conference). We're presenting all of that group meditation affect: meditation, yogic flying, and world peace research.

ME: What got you interested in the Center? What kind of involvement do you have with the Center as a board member?

DR. PETERSON: I've only been a board member for a short period, maybe less than a year. I was one of the original members of the Muncie Peace Network, back in the early to mid-80s. And that was when the point of interest was the Nuclear Freeze Movement because the Soviets and the West were arming up with these huge arsenals of nuclear weapons. There was a pediatrician from Australia named Helen Caldicott, who organized a group of doctors throughout the world to bring this up, to put some attention on it so that we could affect political process. It was called the Nuclear Freeze Movement. I got very involved with that. Physicians for Social Responsibility and Muncie Peace Network were a part of that.

I went to the Watergate hearings. That's a fun story there. I was in medical school and had a month off in the summer, so I decided to hitchhike, which I did every summer if I had the chance. I hitchhiked out to visit my sister in Washington, D.C. She was living out there and she reminded me that the Watergate hearings were going on. They were having these Senate hearings, but then they had this small area where the public could go in. When it was packed, they would shut the doors, and then whenever someone would leave you could get in. So I headed out to the mall and I got in line to hear the Watergate hearings, because I thought it would be pretty historic. At the time we didn't know, we didn't know anything about it because it was just starting. None of this information was coming out yet, but I thought it would still be interesting to go. It turned out that all of the people waiting in line were very politically savvy. There were people from all over the world, and it was a party. It was amazing! I was waiting in line, having fun, and this lady came up with a microphone and suit. She had these young guys wearing suits with her, and she came up to me and said, "Where are you from?" and I said, "Iowa." She says, "What do you do?" and I said "I'm a medical student." And she says, "What do you think?" and I said "We knew Nixon was corrupt!" and went on and on, on this big political rant. Then she left. I got into the Watergate hearings and there wasn't any place to sit, so I found this ledge behind that had this bust of Washington. I set the bust down, and sat up there, so I could see everything. I could see everything, the lights, the cameras, the questioning. I took in the whole day, and at the end everybody left. I was just bedazzled by it thinking, 'How are these people interviewed in this manner, with such scrutiny, and still pull it off?' Anyway, I went back home, real impressed by the whole thing. In the Washington Star, there was this interview of me waiting to get into the Watergate hearings. I ended up hitchhiking back to Iowa and at the end of the summer I called my mother to let her know I was still alive and kicking. She said, "You know, we were out in Portland, Oregon visiting relatives and we were watching the Watergate hearings and there's this guy sitting up there on this ledge that looked just like you!" It was a fun story.

ME: How do you think peace-related efforts have changed over time? How are they different now than they used to be?

DR. PETERSON: I think in general, there really isn't the political interest that there was in the 60s. I mean, it goes in waves, but I really got pretty excited about the occupy movement. I thought it was great to see that kind of interest young people have, but it was mainly kind of an economic movement. You know, the 1% movement. I think it is really important, and really critical. But I think in terms of political projects and peace projects and stuff, there doesn't seem to be as much fire.

ME: Do you have hope that that will grow in the future?

DR. PETERSON: I think for people right now, the real fire comes from young people who see the honest truth in things. Right now there's so much concern with surviving economically. I've talked to some college kids who don't even know where Afghanistan is. I kind of understand it. I mean it's a real tricky economic world we live in so I can see why people don't want to get involved.

The occupy movement. I was involved with that, and provided free healthcare to those who wanted to be involved with that. My hope is that movement, which is still underground right now, still simmering, will come out. Delaware County is a tough place economically and there are a lot of poor people who aren't getting adequate support for food, healthcare, all sorts of things. I'm hoping the occupy movement continues at some level. They're doing more silent projects. It wasn't really a movement where they were looking for publicity, it was just a movement.

ME: With relation to the Peace Center, do you have any suggestions for us? How we can get the word out and boost the awareness?

DR. PETERSON: Well, I think this conference is really pretty neat. That's going to be a nice exposure. It's so interesting with Cohen's history. I think where the Center could really show itself is maybe adopting maybe one or two, major specific projects. Dealing with hatred issues locally. There is the hatred and there is the prejudice. It's not just blacks and Asians... it is gays, and that's a project there. That is a project that could really hit home.

Blog of the Week:

Media

Wesley Patrick

So far, Addicted to War has provided a very different view of the United States and its subsequent foreign policy measures that are more accurate than what is portrayed to/known to be true by the general population. This week's reading was no different. Learning about the extensive reach of corporate power into the milieu of public media was not shocking, but rather just another eye-rolling moment in which any number of solutions could be produced to remove such power and influence on the general public. Granted, I've never been a fan of over-reaching corporations moving to protect their profit-led interests while ignoring public good, but maybe these corporations are onto something. If the average easily duped and would corporate propaganda bombarded with rather ear to said propaganda, bring about change, one propaganda around to plores the virtues of positive peace. Maybe maybe it is time to find the growing warmonger- than accepting the station the integrity of such this idea not the same War employs? The though facts are pro- in an undeniably to make a passionate tices cited throughout has. My question is, how tered truth (if such a truth is presented in Addicted to War, it is, as mentioned before, skewed. So, to the writers of Addicted to War, objective truth is not as important as educating the public on the warmongering policies of the United States just like the corporations value their profit over providing American citizens with objective truth in news reporting.

American citizen is so rather be a sponge for that they are constantly than turning a critical perhaps, in order to simply must turn this fit an agenda that ex- equality, diversity and this is cynical of me, but practical solutions to ing epidemic rather tus quo. While

Much like Addicted to War and the corporations that run public media in America, the short documentary TerrorStorm explored the art of fusing truth with a skewed perspective. However, TerrorStorm did this in a way that actually was more akin to the corporations than to Addicted to War. Blatant lies, invalid survey data, and half-truths were presented in order to create a response that favored the agenda of Alex Jones and his conspiracy theories. Yet, the person who did not think critically about the documentary and did not do their own research on the topics presented, would probably be apt to find themselves believing the contents of the documentary and being angry and afraid. This can be related to the video The Devil Came on Horseback. To add to the already dismal situation in Darfur, there is a general lack of full information on behalf of the Sudanese government and other parties involved to the Sudanese people. The Devil Came on Horseback highlighted some of the struggles of the Darfur region but also explored some of the root causes and interests that have been fueling the conflict in the region for decades. Political /social equality and economic issues/resources are just some of the causes for rebel armies to have organized in this region. Where The Devil Came on Horseback most heavily relates to the discussion on media this week is the fact that the Sudanese government located in the capital continues to skew and alter information in order to achieve its goals. This is seen in covering up much of China's economic interest in the region, to blatantly telling the public that Janjaweed militia is not tied to the current governmental regime.

All of this brings me back to my question, how much do we value objective truth? We are constantly bombarded with new information containing various shades of truth due to the growing influence of technology. The world is growing more integrated on a daily basis. How is one to know that the information that they come across is objective and not merely a perspective? So, is there any value in objective truth at all? Should truth be skewed, altered or in some cases completely thrown out in order to help the collective good; in order to bring about positive social change in which equality and positive peace are pursued? Is it different if truth is forfeited for the common good rather than for profit or personal gain? These are questions I think we all need to answer as individuals and as a species as a whole.

DR. PETERSON: The weekend that we were closing (Docs), one of the filmmakers at Ball State, Bob Mugge, showed up. He's the Endowed Chair of the Telecommunications Department, an internationally known producer of documentary films, mostly music-related. Anyway, he walked into the club, and he ended up documenting the entire weekend for his documentary. From what I understand, his next project will relate to the classic Middletown studies of Muncie carried out in the 1920s and 1930s by Robert and Helen Lynd. Although he and his students will be collaborating on the project with Ball State's Center for Middletown Studies, perhaps Ball State's Center for Peace and Conflict Studies could assist with research or promotion. They (Bob Mugge and his wife and production partner Diana Zelman) want to make one last contribution to the Muncie community before Bob's appointment as endowed chair ends in 2014.
